Hi Mr. Schultz,

That is fine - I would also like to point out that all of us that have tarped roofs on our homes are paying more because some of the heating or air is going out through the tarps so our bills are higher than normal for those of us who are trying to keep our homes dry and from further damage - mine has been running at least $60 to $70 more a month already.

Thanks,

Camille

Public Service Commission PSC PSC
FL

Dear Public Service Commission PSC,

As a Floridian age 59, I'm focusing on rebuilding my life and community and don't want to worry about a higher power bill.

Along with the financial hardships from the Hurricane Michael, as well as skyrocketing healthcare and housing prices and minimal increases in Social Security, an increase in monthly bills add up for people, like myself, who are on fixed incomes.

I am a widow living on one income and half my house is destroyed and uninhabitable and I still have not been able to find a roofer to even begin to start to fix my home up on the inside. Had to gut one entire side at an exorbitant price with the mitigation company. An increase of $8 / 1,000 Kwh is a ridiculous amount of money for this - the bill is already too high as it is. I guess it may be time to look at solar power and/or adding a gas furnace because the electric is way too expensive. All my walls are down and the ceiling so it is a perfect time to pull the gas line into my home further.

I cannot even afford health care and pay a penalty for not having it and now you want to add to my expenses for something like this - really way to hurt someone when they are down.
