Dear Florida Public Service Commission,

As a relatively new owner of solar panels, I urge you not to interfere with the current net metering regulations -- unless you intend to offer a more generous solar buy back from individual homeowners like me.

I made a significant investment in solar technology as something I could do to practice environmental stewardship, and yield a long-term financial return. While Florida's net metering policies helped inform my decision to invest in a solar system, the policy is not "generous" by any stretch, when compared to other states and localities, which pay higher rates for electricity sent to the grid.

Please - do not make any changes to current policies, unless your intent is to offer homeowners like me a more competitive and fair compensation on the energy I send to the grid.

You need to be promoting MORE people to go solar, and protect consumers from bait and switch and price gouging.
